Discussion Topics: This course brings a critical perspective to the traditions and applications of qualitative research in sociology and anthropology. After exploring the epistemological foundations underlying choice of research methodologies and fieldwork methods, students will gain practical experience in a range of tools for producing and evaluating qualitative research and ethnographic studies.. This course will engage with research motivations, ethics, and methodology choices while examining the issues of representation, voice, reflexivity, and researcher positioning.

The course is designed around two main exercises. First, we will explore qualitative research design and analysis through discussion of a set of key readings on fieldwork methods, films, and one primary ethnography, Daniel Goldsteins Spectacular City. The readings, films and in-class exercises will familiarize you with topics including research ethics, research design and site selection, fieldwork methods including observation (participant and unobtrusive), interviewing, testimony and oral history, focus groups, analysis of texts and material culture, visual methods, archival research, data analysis, and writing up and presenting qualitative research. Secondly, students will design and carry out a mini-ethnography incorporating several of the qualitative fieldwork methods learned in class.
